Text messages not syncing on apple watch

If you have an iPhone, then you know the joys of iMessage. We love iMessage so much, we've covered how its features completely blow other messaging platform out of the water. When you're signed in with your Apple ID, it's very easy to switch between iMessage on your iPhone, iPad, iMac, and Apple Watch without any problems. The tricky part comes in when you text someone who is not using iMessage itself. On today's Quick Fix, we solve the question of how to get your text messages (designated with bright green text bubbles, as opposed to iMessage elegant blue) forwarded from your iPhone to appear on your desktop. Simply open Settings and scroll down to Messages. Tap Sms Forwarding and choose which devices you want to receive your text messages. You can now activate your desktop, Apple Watch, or other Apple device that was previously barred from communicating with your non-iMessaging friends. To watch the whole process, check out the video above and go ahead and comment with other technical questions you might want answered in a future episode of Quick Fix. Corbis I'm probably the last person on the planet who doesn't send text messages from my cell phone. What am I missing? You can communicate spontaneously while you're on the go. Since the message is written, there are no ringing phones to disturb others. And just like an email, texting doesn't require an immediate response. Text messages are short, concise and don't waste anyone's time. They give you a written record so they are good for things like directions, addresses and instructions. But no one uses text messages to send long messages. How do you send a text message? With most mobile phones, there's an option on the main menu with features to create and receive messages. You enter the recipient's phone number and then the message, which you can do in one of two ways. The old way, called multi-tap, is to use the letters on the keyboard numbers. But it can be clumsy and slow. Most phones offer a much faster method, usually called T9, or predictive text. This system finds out what words you meant based on past usage and context. Basically, a vocabulary of frequently used words and phrases is loaded into the system and it draws from them every time. What's with lingo? Text messages look like secret code. The maximum you can type in a text message is usually 160 characters, which is just a sentence or two. Then acronyms developed as a kind of shorthand-lol for laughs out loud, brb for being back. A lot of it is phonetic, combining numbers and letters, like c u 2morrow to see you tomorrow. And since it's hard to produce punctuation, you get run-on phrases, no apostrophes, no contractions. What is etiquette for texting? There isn't one. With the limited amount of space and difficulty of writing anything other than letters and numbers, the social adornments are the first to go. There are no greetings or sign-offs. Texting is very direct - it is part of its Chic. How to text to vote or buy some work? In most cases, the company will give you a five-digit number, number, is the address you need instead of a phone number. The second approach used on American Idol is to assign a text address to each participant. You type the address, press Send, and that's your voice. Text messages are also used more commercially. You send a company a text message and they will send you back a discount coupon code or an advertising blurb. Are there any nice texting tricks? To get local listings, you can send a text message to Google by typing 466453 as your address. In the body, type pizza and your zip code, for example, and they will immediately text you back with the nearest pizza place, address and phone number. It's a free service, which is great. You can also get movie times, flight arrivals, even glossaries and French translations. How much do texting cost? It usually costs ten cents to send and receive messages. Or you can get an unlimited plan and pay a flat fee every month – that's what people with teenagers usually do. What are ten terms I need to know to start texting?
